Code of Conduct

Please read our Code of Conduct

The Code of Conduct Governing Use of the EU Academy Platform:

This code of conduct has been drawn up to ensure that users of this service know what is expected of them, and what they can expect from others when using the e(u)academy platform. What follows applies to all user interactions on the platform within courses, events or communities whether open or restricted.

The mission of the e(u)academy is to facilitate access to the world class training offered by the EU Institutions to specialised, professional audiences worldwide. In doing so, we also want to make sure that all of our learners, publishers and instructors feel safe and comfortable while using the platform.

By agreeing to use the platform, each user declares that:

- he or she will register for one account only, unless expressly permitted to register for additional accounts by e(u)academy.
- he or she will ensure that answers submitted to homework, quizzes, exams, projects or other assignments will be their own work (except for assignments that explicitly permit collaboration).
- he or she will not make solutions to homework, quizzes, exams, projects, and other assignments available to anyone else (except to the extent an assignment explicitly permits sharing solutions). This includes both solutions written by the user him or herself, or any solutions provided by the course staff or others.

European Citizen Engagement and Deliberative Democracy Festival

📅 A few days

Deliberative democracy and citizen engagement can be effective responses to the erosion of trust in democratic institutions, as well as helping to develop better policies by including all those concerned in more direct ways. A number of recent studies namely the OECD's report "Catching the Deliberative Wave" and a European Parliament study on "practices of democracy" describes the flourishing of inspiring deliberative democracy initiatives, including many in the EU, where thousands of randomly selected citizens are enrolled into more participatory governance styles in our democratic regimes. This context shows the flourishing interest in these tools and therefore raises expectations of the Commission.
